Portfolio Commentary

The Fund achieved a net return of 0.27% in December, with performance driven by diverse outcomes across the portfolio's underlying strategies. The strong momentum of rising interest rates in the U.S. supported the floating-rate portion of the portfolio, which performed robustly, while fixed-rate strategies experienced moderate losses.

Specifically, the infrastructure-focused bonds returned approximately -0.41%, while the Australian Tier 2 corporate debt strategy generated a return of 0.63%. The U.S. senior loan strategy delivered a return of 0.60%, and private real estate debt contributed 0.59% to the overall performance.

Market Commentary

Rising bond yields across most developed economies shaped market movements in December. In the U.S., anticipation of fiscal support from the incoming administration fueled expectations of higher inflation, pushing the 10-year Treasury yield up by 40 basis points during the month. This increase reverberated through equity, bond, and foreign exchange markets.

Risk assets faced headwinds from higher long-term interest rates, with equity markets reflecting a higher cost of capital. The S&P 500 declined 2.7%, and the ASX 300 posted a negative return of 3.3%, while the STOXX600 advanced 0.7%, partially recovering losses from the previous month. Within equity styles, value stocks experienced the largest losses, while growth stocks fared better. Looking ahead, the second term of Donald Trump as U.S. president begins on January 20, 2025. Market participants are anticipating new policies, which could introduce volatility and weigh on broader market performance.

In fixed income, while central banks maintained a cautious stance with rate cuts, long-term interest rates rose significantly. The Federal Reserve implemented another 25-basis point rate cut at its December meeting. Yet, concerns over potential inflation drove the 10-year U.S. Treasury yield higher by 40 basis points, outpacing increases in other developed markets. The stronger dollar reflected these dynamics, with the U.S. Dollar Index gaining 2.6% over the month.

In Australia, the Reserve Bank of Australia (RBA) kept its policy rate steady at 4.35% during its December meeting. Meeting minutes indicated cautious optimism about guiding inflation back to target but flagged concerns over potential labour market weakness. This suggests the RBA may lean toward a dovish stance on interest rates, potentially delivering a rate cut sooner if labour market data deteriorates. Consequently, the Australian 10-year bond yield rose a modest 7 basis points in December, significantly less than in the U.S. The relative yield disparity pressured the Australian dollar, which depreciated 4.2% against the U.S. dollar during the month.
